Commercial growers have not made this mistake to so great an extent, but have generally made a practice of selecting a good type and a medium size of tuber from the bins during the winter for the following seed crop. In this way some good seed is planted, but for sev-eral reasons a large per cent. is poor seed. A potato tuber is not a seed, but a part of the plant from which it came, consequently the characteristics of the parent plant are more sure to be reproduced in the new plant than in plants that are grown from seed that are the duced in the new plant than in plants that are grown from seed that are the union of two parent plants. A little observation in the field when digging will show that there is a great variation in the different hills of potatoes on a given area. One plant may have 10 or 12 good sized, smooth marketable potatoes. The next may have one good potato with four or five small or inferior ones, or possibly a hill may have but two medium-sized potatoes of the same type as the first hill.
